CURATORIAL NOTES (extract)
By Valerie C. Doran

Leung Mee Ping’s artistic practice is essentially conceptual and investigative, and one of its strongest markers is her relentless and enduring curiosity. Leung’s mixed-media installation Made In Hong Kong is like a conceptual onion: peel away one layer of meaning and association only to find multiple layers underneath. On the first analysis, it is a sophisticated conceptual work bringing into question issues of appropriation, copying and authorship. It takes both as its model and its locus of production that artistic bastion of hand-made replication and appropriation, the ‘artist’s village’ of Dafen village in Shenzhen, which originally grew out of Hong Kong’s souvenir/trade painting. As a conceptual vehicle, Made in Hong Kong shoves us back and forth across the border, scrambling points of view, achieving multiple reversals of the tourist’s and the producer’s gaze. It is the first project in Leung’s ongoing Pearl River Delta Series of conceptual (and to some degree, performative) works in which the artist investigates the various, shifting relationships and mutual infiltration between the cities of the Pearl River Delta: Hong Kong, Macau and Shenzhen.

When Leung Mee Ping first conceived of the Made in Hong Kong project in 2006, many small Hong Kong industries—including its souvenir painting trade—had long since moved over the border. At the same time, the flow of tourism had shifted in the opposite direction: now it was coming from China to Hong Kong. Leung’s curiosity provoked a question: If mainland tourists were coming to Hong Kong, but souvenir paintings were now being made in Shenzhen, then who would produce the Hong Kong souvenir paintings that would reflect the gaze of these mainland Chinese tourists? That same year Leung Mee Ping temporarily moved to Shenzhen, and then went undercover in Dafen. Posing as an amateur artist who wanted to learn the tricks of the trade of souvenir painting, she was accepted as a trainee at the studio of a successful Dafen artist. There she quickly mastered the formulaic painting techniques that allowed rapid production. Gradually, Leung began to commission works from the studio herself, asking them to copy photographs she had taken of Hong Kong attractions popular with mainland tourists, both the fantastical and mundane. She always ordered multiple copies of each image, in varying sizes, and made use of the techniques she had learned to help paint some of the images herself. Yet no matter who actually worked on the paintings, Leung would always sign them herself. She also set a rule that these paintings could only be sold in sets of at least two works, and that each set must always be of the same image, though of any size. Concept made by Hong Kong; product manufactured in Shenzhen.

Entering into the Made in Hong Kong installation is like confronting souvenir painting shop suffering from hypertrophy. One is immediately surrounded by a panoply of oil paintings of all shapes and sizes. The images are all scenes of, or relating to, Hong Kong: clearly touristic in their kitschy presentation and sketchy technique. Yet taken in their totality there is something decidedly odd about them: while some make sense in a souvenir context—Mickey Mouse pointing the way into Disneyland, horse racing at Happy Valley—others seem far too mundane to be enshrined in a painting, or indeed to be an image one would want to take home: a crowd outside a Sasa cosmetic store? A golden toilet that had once belonged to a Hong Kong tycoon? If a souvenir painting represents an idealised view of a place seen through the tourist’s gaze, then one begins to wonder just whose gaze is being represented here anyway?

The present moment reflected in Leung’s ‘souvenir’ paintings, and in the process of their manufacture, represents not only an economic moment and a social moment, but also the claim to a certain kind of ownership of place that souvenir paintings implicitly contain. Multiple gazes, multiple images, multiple claims.

ARTIST’S STATEMENT

I am interested in investigating a kind of uncertainty that exists in the networks that connect things, and in the symptoms of that uncertainty. In my recent works, I do not emphasise revealing or reflecting anything; rather, I generate events through connections, and then try to interpret these events. I am also alert to the tendency towards control in my works, because this can result in the appearance of some kind of order. I think that ambiguity is a very important part of the creative process, as it results in an art action that is difficult to categorise.

At the same time, I also value the time-space contexts within which my works are read – the intercontextual relations formed with the local time and place, in particular as regards community culture. In all of my works, my intention is to raise questions, and then to maintain the possibility of pursuing these questions.
